When he tries to rob her car, he finds her tougher than he expected. Nicky learns she is not only a great con artist but also a good thief. Biomonitoring and toxicological evaluation of estrogenic activity in river water using the natural estrogen receptor luciferase reporter assay. The estrogen receptor (ER) is a ligand-activated nuclear transcription factor, which plays an important role in the development of various human tumors. An ER-luciferase reporter gene assay was developed and validated to measure the estrogenic potential of the water samples in this study. Water samples were collected from an industrialized river to monitor the water quality in the middle-riparian zone. In the river water, an estrogenic potential was observed. In laboratory studies, positive and negative control E(2) samples showed ERE-luciferase activities, which were correlated well with the expected E(2) concentrations ( $R^2=0.96$ ). In the field study, the E(2) concentration of the river water was estimated from ERE-luciferase assay, and compared with E(2) concentration measured by LC-MS/MS. The results were consistent ( $R^2=0.73$ ), indicating that the ERE-luciferase assay can detect the effects of E(2) in the river water. To understand the biological significance of the detected estrogenic activities in the river water, the percentage of estrogenic active chemicals was analyzed. The results indicated that most of the chemicals in river water (95.9%) were estrogenic active. A crew of three men in a white van were arrested on suspicion of dumping more than 200 puppies in the sea. The owner of the puppies, who is under police protection, discovered the puppies dumped in a bin at his work in Southsea, Portsmouth, on Monday. He called police and they were able to retrieve all the dogs - two of which were still alive. The puppies were found in the bin at Southsea on Monday. (SWNS) One of the puppies recovered in Portsmouth. (SWNS) A police spokesman said: "These babies have been through a terrible ordeal, their eyes are closed and they're covered in sores and their skin is loose. They were left in the bin with absolutely no food, water or warmth and they've been dumped in the water, left to die." The owner of the puppies found inside the bin was 82157476af
